in bad medicine sarah a whitt exposes how native american boarding schools and other settler institutions like asylums factories and hospitals during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries worked together as a part of an interconnected system of settler domination in so doing whitt centers the experiences of indigenous youth and adults alike at the Carlisle Indian School, Canton Asylum for Insane Indians, Ford Motor Company, factory house of the Good Shepherd and other progressive era facilities. She demonstrates that in the administration of these institutions which involved moving indigenous people from one location to another, everyday white Americans became deputized as agents of the settler order, bringing together Native American history, settler colonial studies and the history of medicine. Whitt breaks new ground by showing how the confinement of indigenous people across interlocking institutional sites helped concretize networks of white racial power, a regime that Native nations and communities continue to negotiate and actively resist today.

Using archival and ethnographic research, Michael D. McNally follows the making of Ojibwe eldership, showing that deference to older women and men is part of a fuller moral, aesthetic and cosmological vision connected to the ongoing circle of life and tradition of authority that has been crucial to surviving colonization.

Dressing Global Bodies addresses the complex politics of dress and fashion from a global perspective spanning four centuries, tying the early global to more contemporary times to reveal clothing practice as a key cultural phenomenon and mechanism of defining one's identity. This collection of essays explores how garments reflect the hierarchies of value, collective and personal inclinations, religious norms and conversions. Apparel is now recognized for its seminal role in global colonial and postcolonial engagements, and for its role in personal and collective expression. Patterns of exchange and commerce are discussed by contributing authors to analyse powerful and diverse colonial and postcolonial practices. This volume rejects assumptions surrounding a purportedly all-powerful Western metropolitan fashion system and instead aims to emphasize how diverse populations seized agency through the fashioning of dress. Dressing Global Bodies contributes to a growing scholarship considering gender and race, place and politics through the close critical analysis of dress and fashion. It is an indispensable volume for students of history and especially those interested in fashion, textiles, material culture and the body across a wide time frame.

Vol. 6 includes the 23rd biennial report of the Society, 1923-24, as an extra number.
